I've been fortunate enough to visit many countries.

Mexico, Spain, Italy, Romania, Japan, Taiwan, the UK,
the Netherlands and Thailand.
Each has taught me so much about history, culture, people, and myself.

And yet... I still yearn. I think if you get to travel

and you enjoy it

The desire grabs you by the throat and ~~ever~~ lets go. Wanderlust, they call it, which is apt, because it's an all-consuming desire.
It beckons you along to your next port of call, where it instructs you to immerse yourself for months at a time, if you can. Stay, appreciate, learn, discover, and live as if you'd always been there, but through the eyes of an outside newcomer. This is how you find yourself and the world, and this is how you realise though we're all so different, we're alike in many ways.

Different people and cultures show you there's no one right way of living or experiencing or thinking about it.

world. And just when you think you know all the right words, the way through the streets, the best spots for food and friends, and you feel like this could be home...

Well, then the
call comes,
to take you
away with
it. And you're gone, again.
